
Subject: Re: [PATCH 5/5] make netlink user -> kernel interface synchronous
Posted by Patrick McHardy on Fri, 05 Oct 2007 16:24:27 GMT

View Forum Message <> Reply to Message

Denis V. Lunev wrote:

- > This patch make processing netlink user -> kernel messages synchronous.
- > This change was inspired by the talk with Alexey Kuznetsov about current
- > netlink messages processing. He says that he was badly wrong when introduced
- > asynchronous user -> kernel communication.
- >
- > The call netlink_unicast is the only path to send message to the kernel
- > netlink socket. But, unfortunately, it is also used to send data to the
- > user.
- >
- > Before this change the user message has been attached to the socket queue
- > and sk->sk_data_ready was called. The process has been blocked until all
- > pending messages were processed. The bad thing is that this processing
- > may occur in the arbitrary process context.
- >
- > This patch changes nlk->data_ready callback to get 1 skb and force packet
- > processing right in the netlink_unicast.

I guess the process credential stuff in netlink_skb_params can now be removed as well.
