I'm counting on RHEL-only kernels for the foreseeable future, atleast until I hear otherwise...

This is from Kir's blog post made in August 2011:

Quote:Currently, there are no non-stable kernels in development. Eventually we will port to Linux kernel 3.x, but it might not happen this year. Instead, we are currently focused on bringing more of OpenVZ features to mainstream Linux kernels.

I'm sure one of the developers will chip in if there are any news about this subject.
