I agree with your considerations.

The problem here is OpenVZ creates another level, which tools such as webmin have to deal with. It's not a single system anymore -- rather this is a set of systems to be dealt with.

Tools such as webmin have to cope with it, and probably it can not be implemented in a single plugin -- the whole system has to be rewritten to take the new reality into account. This is just my thought -- I am not a webmin expert.
